Being a HR personnel, traits like observing the behaviour pattern of people came naturally to her, something that she has applied to study, research and later write about, in her latest book The Angel of God. "Based out of places like

Kerala, Mumbai, and even the Middle East, this book revolves around a character called Moosa who was born in the slums of Mumbai, something that gave him a ticket to get into crime. The book is about the transformation that happens in a person's life, like in that of the character. It is all about how small incidents become a pivotal point. It also tries to understand the psychological profile of a human side that everyone possesses," says Jyothi Menon, the author.

According to the author,

she does not intend to glorify crime. "An interesting aspect of the book is the professional insight that it offers into these organisations. Criminal organisations are productive, you know," she tells me. Even as the book explores this aspect, one can definitely take back something from this truly fictional account.
